

D'bora Ware

A native of Washington, D.C., Deborah "D'bora" Ware's involvement with the art world was dated as far back as in high school. D'bora studied under the late Harry Poe -- the founder and director of Ebony Impromptu Theatre Company and D.C. Black Repertory founded by Robert Hooks in Washington, D.C. She was in several plays before the corporate world called her name. After four decades in prestigious law firms as a legal secretary, such as for The Legal Aid Society of New York - Criminal Appeals, she decided to make the transition back to the art world, which was her true love.

In 2015, she was nominated and awarded as a "gold" winner for the best-supporting actress for the movie role in Jade Bryan's "The Shattered Mind" by Global Independent Film Awards Committee. It was filmed in 2014 in New York City.

In 2019, she also performed in "Z A Christmas Story" in Washington, D.C., and New York City. The play was written and produced by Jeffrey Bowden and directed by Michelle Banks.

In her spare time, she paints abstract art and designs jewelry. Now that her dream in the art world has become a reality, it is her determination that she will be in it for the long haul.
